THE COMMUNITY LIBRARY

For many years, learners in Kijani village had limited access to books outside school. The nearest public library was far away, and travelling there was difficult for families who had little money for transport. A group of young people therefore approached the village elders with an idea: they wanted to turn an unused room at the community centre into a small library.

The elders welcomed the proposal but advised the young people to prepare a plan. The group listed the resources they would need, including shelves, reading tables, chairs and books. They asked families to donate books in good condition and approached local businesses for help with furniture. Some volunteers repaired the room, painted the walls and arranged the donated books according to reading levels and subjects.

When the library opened, learners were excited. A volunteer prepared a simple borrowing register so that books could be tracked and returned on time. The library also set aside an hour each Saturday for storytelling and reading aloud. At first, only a few children attended, but the number increased as families saw the value of the service.

The project did more than provide books. It created a meeting place where people shared ideas, helped one another and developed a stronger reading culture. The young people learned that a useful community project requires planning, cooperation and commitment.
